

Business 6 Trust Model

This illustrates the advantages of semi-complex diversity of ownership under your sole control in a medium-size business setting. Notice the greater separation of the property held and the finer “division of labor” between each trust, keeping the business in a tight but flexible, self-revolving network that you are the sole controller of. Here the Administrative Trust still acts as the owner of the business, and may even finance, fund, and even underwrite the liability of the other trusts, but the other trusts also provide some of these functions out of the payments they accumulate from in-house leases of assets and services. They always reserve the option to barter leases, services, and may even make advances to their sister & brother trusts. This greater division gives the business double the protection and flexibility than with the 3 trust business model and liability is limited even more because of the better grouping of assets between each trust. The increased circulation of funds changing hands from trust to trust gives better “energy” flow within this micro-economic system. As always, the object is to make the most use of the private debt/credit system inherent in the trusts we’ve designed. This way, everything is a matter of expenses, debts and credits between private entities, not income, and therefore tax liability is altogether avoided.
